A tender account—by turns cultural exploration and memoir—of a young woman’s firsthand experience of change and continuity in one of the world’s most remote regions, through the lens of the horse and “horse culture.”

At just 19, Sienna Craig made her first venture to Mustang, an ethnically Tibetan area of Nepal, in the rainshadow of the Himalayas. As an equestrian and a budding anthropologist, she sought not only to understand what it was like to rely on horses to navigate through the windswept valleys and plains of High Asia, but also to grasp how horses lent meaning to the lives of the Mustangi people. Through living and working with local Tibetan doctors, veterinarians, and other horse experts, as well as the deep friendships she formed, Sienna began to understand the region’s history, and the way life in Mustang was being transformed in the face of tremendous social, political, and economic shifts. She learned much about herself and her life’s course through her year in Mustang—a place that came to feel, for all its foreignness, like home.

Sienna Craig was born in Santa Barbara, California. She is the author of the children’s book Clear Sky, Red Earth: A Himalayan Story and A Sacred Geography: Sonnets of the Himalaya and Tibet. She is currently an assistant professor at Dartmouth College. She lives in Vermont with her husband Ken and her daughter Aida.
Horses Like Lightning
For Ken
Horses like lightning: a story of passage through the Himalayas  / Sienna Craig.
p. cm.
DS495.8.M87C73 2008
954.96—dc22
2008012113

12 11 10 09 08
5 4 3 2 1

Wisdom Publications’ books are printed on acid-free paper and meet the guidelines for permanence and durability of the Production Guidelines for Book Longevity of the Council on Library Resources.

Printed in the United States of America.

This book was produced with environmental mindfulness. We have elected to print this title on 30% PCW recycled paper. As a result, we have saved the following resources: 27 trees, 19 million BTUs of energy, 2,369 lbs. of greenhouse gases, 9,832 gallons of water, and 1,263 lbs. of solid waste. For more information, please visit our website, www.wisdompubs.org. This paper is also FSC certified. For more information, please www.fscus.org.
Table of Contents

Prologue 1

Part 1

Finding Mustang 9
Come as a Guest, Go as a Friend 19
The Dancing Yak 35
The Family God Horse 42
Keeping Up Appearances 51

Part 2

Mustang Elements 61
Sacrifice at the Jimi Hendrix Restaurant 70
Scars of Tradition 79
In the Shadow of Warriors 90

Part 3

Royal Mustang Excursions 115
Heat and Dust 126
Am I a “Conservation”? 138
Muledrivers and Kings 148
Woodsmoke and Radishes 160
A Ritual, a Birth 173
HORSES LIKE LIGHTNING

PART 4
National Geographic  187
A Passing  199
Stones and Lost Children  206
The Story of the Ground  215
To Heal a Horse  221

PART 5
An Intimate Distance  237
Mustang Tour Guide  251
The Brothers  260
Ruins  267
Windhorse  275
Epilogue  285

Acknowledgments  290
Sources and Selected Reading  293
Prologue

Beauty is the moment of transition, as if the form were just ready to flow into other forms.
—Ralph Waldo Emerson

My father is trained as an archaeologist. He has sculptor’s hands and an astral stare that can see right through me. When I was small, he wore a beard and often smelled of earth. In those years, he worked with Chumash Indians who lived in and around Santa Barbara. We took long walks together, and he would point out arrowheads and shards of pottery in the dirt. Archaeology eyes, he called them. To me, his perceptiveness was a small miracle. He was a scavenger, a finder of lost things. His imagination could piece together village histories from soil, sky, and stones. There was hawk in him: piercing, graceful, and often alone.

My mother is a painter. To her, anything torn apart can be reassembled. There are no wrong lines. This sense of creativity enlivens her, that seized moment of seeing and then seeing again. Even now, more than three decades after I was born, I can imagine her as the young mother she once was, a long braid down her back, her knees rough with paint. Her studio is sacred space—a place where she can be alone, most fully herself. It is an intimate place she rarely opens up to others. But as her young child, and therefore as an extension of herself, I sometimes joined her. I drew and wrote stories, watching as she worked a piece, moving across her medium of collage, the white expanse of walls cluttered with her different reckonings of art. She kept a shrine in the corner—feathers and stones and other found offerings—above which was tacked a small piece of paper. “Go, little picture!” it read.
I suppose that California in the seventies was anything but \textit{normal}, but when I was small, Kraft macaroni and cheese and Barbie dolls were my exotica. Instead of a swing set in my backyard, we had a sweat lodge. On weekends or after long days at a dig, the house would be given over to my father’s colleagues. I watched as the crew of Chumash and longhaired white folk stripped down in the California sun and crawled into the lodge, with its willow branch spine and eucalyptus leaf skin. Part of me was embarrassed by the bareness of it all—the incongruity in what was otherwise a suburban tract house neighborhood, near the freeway—but I still love the smell of white sage and steam rising off rocks.

Sometimes the discrepancies between my upbringing and those of my schoolmates jarred, embarrassed, disappointed me. I can remember longing for my mother to pick me up from school wearing anything but her shimmering Dolphin running shorts and cutoff T-shirt, invariably splattered with paint. “My mom is an artist,” I would say to my friends as they glanced at their mothers with their station wagons and matching pantsuits, and then stared at my mom. In my heart, I felt I knew what being an artist or an archaeologist meant. I could sense, if not articulate, something of the intersubjective tension that is at the creative heart of what has also become my discipline, my vocation: the practice of moving between worlds, charting differences, and understanding how meaning is made across human experience. But in my youth I also learned to live this dissonance, and to accept the fact that some things would not translate. In that sense, I have been preparing for Mustang for as long as I can remember.

My parents nourished my curiosity and, by virtue of their own choices, helped me to feel comfortable living between worlds. And, as much as painting and archaeology are intuitive, my parents gave me confidence in my own ability to decipher, to draw lines, to dig things up.

I remember being small, thigh-high against my father’s wiry legs. He had taken me out to an archaeological site on the northern edge of Santa Barbara, near Point Conception, the most westerly jut of the California coastline and the point at which, according to Chumash cosmology, spirits leave this world. Although at the time I simply knew it as a place where dolphins streamed through the Pacific and osprey flew in circles overhead, I could still appreciate it as sacred ground.

When we arrived at the site, my father and I began to explore, looking for things. Eucalyptus trees rustled in the afternoon wind and the air grew still. An eagle feather lying on the ground caught my attention and I reached down to pick it up. The shaft of cartilage felt cool in my hand. I knew eagles were rare, and the brittle plume felt like a gift.

I shook the feather. As I shook it, the earth itself began to shake. In seconds, the asphalt buckled and kneeled. My father picked me up—feather and all. We tried to stand still while the ground beneath our feet swayed and rumbled. As a native Californian, I had experienced earthquakes before, but, for me, there have been none like this one since.

When the ground stopped shaking, my eyes darted between the wrinkled road and the feather I still held in my hand. “Papasan, did I do that?” I finally squeaked. “Maybe,” he said, smiling. He had seen me shake the feather, and had witnessed the sense of power and magic that accompanied this gesture and its aftermath. Despite our own rationality, for that first kinetic moment, my shake was eagle and earth and energy through me, beyond me, toward something deeper—the ways humans and other animals share worlds, bleed into each other.

I am an only child. As parents went, and as far as I could tell when I was young, mine seemed well matched. But this match, made when they were young themselves, ended with difficulty by their early thirties, as I was turning ten. I was given my first horse around the time of their separation, and my adolescence passed mostly at the barn. I mucked out stalls, fed oat hay and alfalfa pellets to my four-legged charges, and swept the aisles. These tasks helped to earn my horse’s keep. My fingernails were never clean, but my mare’s coat glistened like a wet seal in the sun. I kept my brushes and hoof pick, fly spray and bandages in a tin trunk painted blue. It bent easily, and after a few weeks of my sitting on it as I pulled on my riding boots, the top caved in. But it was mine, and the mare was mine, and that was enough.

In the years when my parents’ marriage incinerated, I found solace at the barn. The other girls who hung out at the stables were more sisters than any friendships since. We spoke first of horses and only later of boys. Gathered on the fence like crows when our trainer schooled a horse, we were initiates, learning through participation and observation to belong to this horse culture, to know its language. After our rides, we played in the hay barns until dusk. But my barn sisters had their own families to contend with, and there was little to say or talk through with them about my parent’s dissolving marriage. I could talk to horses, though.

Summit, a chestnut-colored gelding with a dished face, was neither the strongest nor the most beautiful horse I ever rode, but he was the best listener. On days when I didn’t want to be found, I sat in the corner of his stall, just talking quietly to him. Summit nibbled alfalfa, using his upper lip to separate it from the wood shavings that made his bed, as I confided in him about late-night arguments and my worries about our dissolving family. If I happened upon Summit early in the morning or late in the evening, when he was lying down in his stall, he would let me curl up next to him—something horses don’t usually tolerate. That gesture felt more intimate than the arms of most lovers since. One winter, when Summit was nearly dead from pneumonia, he took to laying his entire neck and head in my lap—a heavy weight for a twelve-year-old girl to bear. But I was strong and I managed. I stroked him between the ears as he labored for breath.

By the time I was a teenager, I had ridden and cared for a succession of horses, each more challenging than the last, and had had success in competitions. The ribbons that lined my bedroom walls insulated me from the domestic chaos beyond them. While my parents were breaking up, I think I spoke to their answering machines more than I did to them. I would tell all to the tape: school grades, slumber party schemes, details of that afternoon’s riding lesson, or even deeper murmurings. That way my parents would register something of my daily life, would know where I was, and would show up on time, I hoped, to take me home.

College wasn’t really a place for riding. I dreamed about horses, though, and counted paces in horse strides. I even spent some time as a member of the Brown University Equestrian Team. But the Californian in me had a difficult time riding indoors, and the academic demands of college precluded long afternoons at the barn, when time seemed to stop.

During my tenure at Brown, the world’s cultures and religions fascinated me and likewise directed my studies. I knew that I wanted to go abroad and was drawn to Asia. In 1993, during my junior year, I went to Nepal for the first time. The last month of that semester was to be devoted to conducting an independent project, and I entertained the idea of living with Tibetan nuns. That is, until I found out that there were horses and a rich “horse culture”—in a place called Mustang, no less.
We often walked away from the town in the late afternoon sunset. There were no paved roads and no fences—no trees—it was like the ocean but it was wide, wide land. The evening star would be high in the sunset sky when it was still broad daylight. That evening star fascinated me. It was in some way very exciting to me.

I had nothing but to walk into nowhere and the wide sunset space with the star.

—Georgia O'Keeffe
My middle name, Radha, recalls the days when my parents ate too much bee pollen and brown rice, when they stuffed Robert Graves’ poetry and the Bhagavad Gita in their pockets. Radha is the consort of Krishna, the playful yet fierce incarnation of Vishnu the Preserver within the Hindu pantheon. This young girl, a simple cowherd by birth, is often depicted in gardens, reclining on swings, listening to Krishna play his flute. At once demure and powerful, Radha keeps Krishna—that blue-skinned scamp, that trickster—coming back.

When I was a teenager, I despised the name Radha. My best friend at the time was Rebecca, a girl nearly three years my senior with freckles and blonde hair whose life, in contrast to mine, seemed exceedingly normal. I’m not sure when I made the decision to change my middle name—without informing my parents—but my diploma from high school reads Rebecca, not Radha. And by then I had read the Bhagavad Gita myself.

Yet by the time I first traveled to Nepal, Radha was back on my passport. “Ah, Radha,” a portly Nepali immigration official with a betelnut-stained smile remarked as I waited for him to stamp my student visa. “Good Hindu name,” he offered. “Welcome in Nepal.” And I was.

I emerged from the Tribhuvan International Airport and was overcome by contrast: aural, sensory, aesthetic, natural. Enormous cumulus clouds billowed above fluorescent paddies, bursting with moisture. Even the most dilapidated of brick buildings shone in the afternoon light. On first impression, this city seemed burnished and used, by turns. There was the smell of chiya, Nepali sweet tea, petrol fumes, and cow dung. As my fellow students and I were driven by bus through the capitol’s crowded, narrow streets toward our program house, I was struck not so much by abject signs of poverty as much as I was moved by a sense of resourcefulness: children transforming discarded paper clips, rubber bands, and empty instant noodle bags into the stuff of play, while others combed rubbish piles for bits of recyclable material; entire families shuttling through traffic on one motorcycle; tailors sewing scrap pieces of fabric into coin purses or baby slippers. In contrast, the sense of waste, and of excess, that seemed to me so obvious about my own country was made more so after only hours in Nepal. Those first few weeks in the country, as I began studying Nepali language, learning more of the country’s history, and experiencing its culture by participating in my home-stay family’s daily rhythms, I felt at once overwhelmed and deeply happy.

Kathmandu at the end of the twentieth century was also a city of paradox and multiplicity, and made me acutely aware of the passage of time. Stone statues of gods, thousands of years old and more delicate than the flowers offered them, stood along thoroughfares and in back alleys, near motorcycle repair shops and stores that sold pirated videos from Beijing and New Delhi. Women on their way to work as beauticians at five-star hotels took the time to offer vermilion and incense to temple deities. On the streets, lorries halted for befuddled cows. White-gloved policemen conducted traffic: three-wheeled electric cars called “temps,” stuffed full of school children and commuters; porters weighted down by wide-screen televisions or refrigerators; diplomats and Nepali politicians in imported SUVs with tinted windows. The country captured me immediately.

By early October, Kathmandu still rode on the edges of a verdant monsoon, yet the days dawned crisp, and pockets of morning fog wispé and gathered like a long, smooth veil. On this morning, as I peddled my bicycle to the program house, I felt grateful that the night’s downpour had cleansed the polluted city air. I could see the Himalayas rising up from the northern horizon. I pulled in to the program house, parked my bicycle, and joined some of my fellow college students on the roof. Some were smoking Yak cigarettes, others were sipping chiya before the day officially began. Downstairs in the kitchen, Lawa, the Tibetan cook, was chopping onions for the midday meal, reciting Buddhist prayers as he worked. He had been a monk before he left Tibet and still carried with him something of a monastic presence.

The unstructured lull of morning was broken by the sound of a bell ringing downstairs, signaling that it was time for lecture. Charles Ramble, a British anthropologist, had come to give a talk about Mustang, one of Nepal’s seventy-five districts nestled deep in the Himalayas, and the site of his research for more than a decade. In anticipation of his lecture, my fellow students and I had read some of Charles’s work. As with other visits to our program house by Nepali and foreign experts, it was not lost on this rather motley crew of American college students that this was a precious way to learn. My fellow students and I filed into the common room, sat down on cushions or the low platforms that lined the space, and listened.

“I’d like you to think for a moment,” Charles began, “about the difference between cultural and political borders, about how language and religion relate to the landscape.” Charles sat cross-legged on the floor in front of us. His hands looked more like those of a muleskinner than a scholar. He wore years in the corners of his eyes and had a beguiling smile.

“Mustang is a good example. It lies between Dhaulagiri, the sixth tallest mountain in the world, and the Annapurna massif. In the southern reaches of this district, the Kali Gandaki River forms earth’s deepest gorge.” Charles showed a slide, taken from out the window of an airplane, to illustrate. A serpentine of frothy gray-green water coursed through crags and solid rock, conifers clinging at all angles from the gorge’s edge. Even from this aerial view, I could sense the power of this river—a visceral understanding of this landscape’s extreme nature, of its beauty and danger.

As Charles spoke, I learned that Mustang was located in Nepal’s Karnali Zone, and that Jomsom, Mustang’s district headquarters, was about a five-day walk away from Pokhara, a mid-hills town below the Annapurnas. Though there were flights between Pokhara and Jomsom, most people from Mustang walked this passage. What did it mean, I wondered, to measure distance not in miles, but in days, in footsteps?
That morning, I learned that the Kali Gandaki valley was not only the deepest gorge on earth, but also that it had been a thoroughfare of trans-Himalayan trade for centuries. Pictures of mule trains and yak caravans bespoke an ancient exchange—highland salt for lowland grains—as much as they also captured a sense of Mustang's place as a trekking destination par excellence. Some of the animals in Charles's slides were loaded down with crates of Coca Cola bottles, Rara instant noodles, Cadbury chocolate bars, and muesli.

Charles flipped through more slides. Images of a stark landscape came into focus. Soil and sky seemed to part irrevocably here. Cliffs and ruins resembled eroding sandcastles—not an inaccurate description considering that hundreds of millions of years ago, all of the Himalayan range was ocean floor, above which ran the salty currents of the Tythes Sea. As we watched, two of my Nepali language teachers, high-caste Hindus from Kathmandu, whispered to each other.

“Oh my! Can you believe people live there?”

“I've been to Mustang once, to go on pilgrimage to the temples at Muktinath. The wind blew so hard that I couldn't see. Everything was dirty!”

Slides of coniferous forests and apple orchards in southern Mustang soothed their tone. Beneath the whir of the slide projector, they conferred about the price of Mustang apples in Kathmandu markets. But even southern Mustang, with its forests and glacial streams, was rough country. Windswept and arid, most of Mustang's villages lie between eight and twelve thousand feet.

I was entranced by this landscape. Homes, monasteries, and trailside cairns were striped with earthen pigments of gray, white, and red. These marks symbolized Rigsum Gombo, a trinity of Buddhist deities—Avalokitesvara, Manjushri, and Vajrapani—that protected this sacred geography. Doors and windows seemed built on a Hobbit-sized scale, and some were marked with suns and moons. Charles explained that these doors were small to ensure that people bent over as they entered—to prevent ro lang, or zombies, from entering homes. Stones the size and shape of ostrich eggs were brought up from riverbeds and formed the foundations of dwellings. Groves of poplars and willows rustled along riverbanks in an otherwise treeless place. Wood is wealth here, I learned.
Most people in Mustang are agro-pastoralists and traders. They raise crops, herd animals, exchange goods, and now cater to tourists. Village temples and monasteries punctuate this landscape, a place of oxidized earth, chalky hillsides of borax and salt, and eroding cliffs speckled with caves. Fields of barley, buckwheat, and rapeseed create a tapestry of green, pink, and gold.

Small Himalayan horses dotted the hillsides and villages in Charles’s photographs, as did herds of sheep and goats. Mules carried enormous loads, their heads crowned with tassels made from yak tails dyed red, and their necks encircled in bells. Yak herds wandered the high pastures. At seventeen thousand feet, these were bucolic realms speckled with wildflowers and medicinal plants during the brief summer, and snow-bound most of the year. Lower down, dzos, yak-cow crossbreeds, intermingled with smaller bovines, horses, and miniature donkeys.

“I should clarify what is meant by the name ‘Mustang,’” Charles said. “Since I’m speaking to a group of Americans, I should tell you that the scruffy ponies you see in my slides bear no relation either to the feral horses of your country or this region’s name. Mustang is the Nepali misnomer for the Tibetan monthang, meaning ‘plain of aspiration.’”

Charles went on to tell us that although many people use the terms “upper Mustang” and “Lo” interchangeably, they were actually different. What Nepalis call upper Mustang includes the seven counties of the kingdom of Lo as well as an area called the Shôd Yul. These regions, distinguished by language as well as by local lineages and rituals, had been closed to foreigners until the previous year, mostly because of its proximity to Tibet, and had only the previous year become open on a restricted basis. Lower Mustang was part of the Annapurna trekking circuit, and saw thousands of travelers each year.

“This entire region was once made up of many different principalities, loosely bound to the ancient western Tibetan kingdom of Zhang Zhung. Today only one of these principalities, the kingdom of Lo, remains active. The king of Lo lives in the walled city of Monthang, just a few hours’ ride south of the Nepal/Tibet border.” As Charles spoke of the regions encompassed by Mustang District, I learned that many different cultural groups live along this passageway between Nepal and Tibet. My notebook was a
I noted that clusters of settlements were sprinkled throughout the region, housing ethnically Tibetan and Thakali people. While the Thakali were one of Nepal’s smallest ethnic groups, their reputation as middlemen on the ancient trans-Himalayan salt-grain trading route was legendary. I followed along as Charles described this region, which, like so much of Nepal, was a crossroads of culture, religion, and landscape.

Charles also spoke of the religious diversity of the area, how Hindus, Tibetan Buddhists, and Bon practitioners—followers of Tibet’s pre-Buddhist traditions—all lived among each other. Charles wove together stories about the transmission of Buddhist teachings from India to Tibet beginning in the seventh century with Mustang’s history, and the rise to power in the “more recent past”—the 1380s—of Lo’s first king, Amepal.

This description of Mustang made me wonder what sort of a place would make the fourteenth century seem recent. Though the shards of California’s past were familiar to me, my ability to identify a midden pile or an arrowhead could not erase the concurrent reality of strip malls and condos, conquistador heritage as a tourist attraction. When it came to imagining a place that had passed through history and yet remained somehow more consistent, if not unchanged, I had little to refer to. Rome and Florence and Oxford were ancient cities I had experienced, and yet they, like Kathmandu, were also unmistakably modern.

As I first encountered Mustang, I struggled to keep myself from conceiving of this region as an area existing outside of time, romanticizing the landscape and culture. I would soon learn that this was precisely the image Nepali tourism ventures and foreign travelers, alike, were invested in promoting—despite local realities, local histories. To many, Mustang had become known as a “lost” and “hidden” Tibetan kingdom that was now accessible. But, Shangri-la fantasies aside, what I really came to learn from Charles’s lecture was that I had no reference point from which to understand subsistence—living by the land. This both fascinated and disturbed me.

“Regardless of where you are in Mustang, villages can startle you,” Charles continued. The next slide revealed just such an image: a cluster of houses built above a river valley, and an oasis of green barley fields. Sheer rock faces loomed on either side.

scribble of unfamiliar names and places: Bhote, Baragaon, Shöd Yul, Bön.
“This is the village of Kagbeni, or Kag in the local Tibetan dialect. The name means ‘stop’ and this village has been a checkpoint and trading post for hundreds of years. It now divides the restricted and non-restricted regions of Mustang. One can’t travel beyond Kagbeni without a special permit.” Charles clicked forward the slides to reveal smooth, barren looking hills framed by sky: natural and manmade structures of equal providence, both eroding.

As Charles spoke, I wondered what he saw when he looked at these photographs. Did he feel comfortable here? Was this home to him?

By later in the fifteenth century, the kingdom of Lo was secure enough in wealth and power that its kings invited artisans from great distances—Kathmandu, Lhasa, India, and even Persia—to paint murals and make statues. Although many were in disrepair, the monasteries in Lo were among the grandest buildings intact in the Tibetan-speaking world.

In 1769, King Pritvi Narayan Shah and his army from Gorkha swept through the Himalayas and conquered the Kathmandu Valley, eventually creating the nation of Nepal. At that time Lo and other principalities in what is today Mustang District were still closely connected to the kingdoms of western Tibet; yet during the Nepal-Tibet wars in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, the kings of Lo sided with Nepal. Despite these alliances, Lo’s ties, in terms of culture, language, and tradition, are to Tibet. Lo eventually became politically part of Nepal, and the king, or raja, of Lo retained a good deal of local autonomy.

Mustang’s history rolled off Charles’s fluent tongue. I began to understand how someone could become addicted to this process of becoming an “insider” in a foreign place. It struck me that knowing local languages, as Charles did, was part of this puzzle—but only part. For what belied language in this sense of fluency was the way a place’s wind or sky becomes a part of your own skin; the way the tinny lilt of a horse’s bell can call you home.

As the lecture proceeded, I realized that people couldn’t live here if it weren’t for their animals. I’d seen ponies, brightly decorated in Tibetan saddle blankets. It began to dawn on me that this was a land that needed horses. In a flash, I understood why I’d come to Nepal: halfway around the world and here I was, still horse crazy. In that sense, I was also doing what many an anthropologist and traveler before me has done. I was searching out the familiar in an unfamiliar landscape, drawing on a vocabulary of equivalents as a way of learning, of asking questions.

After the lecture, I approached Charles. “Do horses play a cultural role in Mustang?” I asked.

“Do you read French?” he responded. An unlit cigarette dangled from his lips.

“Excuse me?” I said, taken aback.

“Sorry. Yes. Horses are very important. People pay a lot of money for them, especially these days. They used to have little bearing on much beyond transport. The nobles rode, but not many other people could afford horses. Why do you ask?”

“I grew up riding. I was thinking of going to a nunnery in the Khumbu for my independent project, but if there are horses in Mustang, well…” I paused. “But where does the French come in?”

“Oh, yes. There’s a French Tibetologist named Blondeau. She’s translated a Tibetan book about horse care. I skimmed it years ago. Frankly, it is not my cup of tea. But I suppose an equestrienne would get excited about things like the significance of a horse’s coat color or the ways to cure a horse who’s been attacked by a wolf.”

“That sounds fascinating,” I said. “I would love to see the book…but I don’t read French.” I glimpsed a brief wave of disappointment pass across Charles’s face.

“Spanish,” I fumbled. “Grew up in California.”

“I see. Well, perhaps one of your fellow students could help you with translation. I have a copy of Blondeau’s book somewhere.”

“That would be great. But what about Mustang? How do people care for horses? Do women ride? Do they figure into local religion somehow? Are there horse gods? Would people consider me really odd if I went to Mustang to do a project on horses?”

“People are quite particular about their horses,” Charles hinted. “At certain times of the year horses are taken to a sacred lake to drink and be bathed. Other times they let blood from horses, sometimes from their nostrils, other times from their tongues. I’ve never really asked much about this. But there are definitely things to explore.”
“You mentioned Tibetan horse texts,” I probed.

“Indeed. The texts translated into French are facsimiles of manuscripts found in the T’ung Huang caves—a place in China that was once part of greater Tibet. But there are others, and some are local in origin. The king of Mustang owns some beautiful ones. But he’s quite particular about who can browse his library.”

On mention of the king of Mustang, I was overcome. It was as if a small piece of information about a man I’d never met in a place I’d never been held something not only of my future but also of my past. Charles coughed, rubbed out a cigarette and reached for another. A fruit salesman called out prices for bananas from behind the gates of our schoolhouse compound, and a bicycle bell sounded in the street below us. The feeling passed.

“Horses are becoming more and more important, economically speaking, especially now that upper Mustang has been opened up to tourism,” Charles continued. “Both the people who live in southern Mustang as well as people from Lo are vying for the horse rental market. There is serious competition these days.”

“So, if I went to Mustang, where should I start?”

“Go to Jomsom, the district headquarters. You could start by finding a local doctor named Tshampa Ngawang. Tshampa, by the way, means someone who has completed a three-year Buddhist retreat. You won’t hear it used often. Anyway, this Tshampa has worked with many students. He has some horse texts, one of which I think he borrowed from the king of Lo. He and his wife, Karma, run a lodge near the airport, the Dancing Yak. He may not be in Mustang when you arrive, but it’s worth a try.” Charles paused, took a long drag, and motioned for me to hand him my notebook.

“Nirmal Gauchan is a local politician and a lodge owner. He’s also a good friend.” Charles scribbled his name into my journal. “He’ll help set you up with a translator, if you want one. Go to the Hotel Alka Marco Polo, across from the airport. I don’t know how much he knows about horses, but he is a good person to speak with, regardless. A big man about town.”

I felt my first wave of fieldwork fear. What was I doing? Going to a strange place alone to ask strangers about horses? If I hadn’t been so intrigued by the notion of horse texts—ancient words that could perhaps reveal something deeper about this curious bond between human and animal, between girl and horse—maybe I would have abandoned the idea altogether. But that initial burst of excitement, coupled with the beauty of Mustang as revealed by Charles’s photos and the fact that I was not actually out there on my own yet, facing more pressing challenges of language and loneliness, kept me going.

“The other person you should try to find is Nyima Dandril. He should be in a village called Chongkhor in the Muktinath Valley. He’s looking after my horse these days.”

“You have a horse?” I said with kindred excitement.

“Of course,” Charles smiled warmly. “It is the only way to travel in Mustang.”